Chelsea Turner is fed up with Darnell, the man she's seeing. He refuses to commit to their relationship (and it doesn't help that he is married). Then out of the blue her first true love, Sharmar reappears. He wants to pick up where he and Chelsea left off. When the truth about his sudden disappearance years ago comes to light, Chelsea is dismayed that the man has more baggage than an airport terminal. In addition to her troubled personal relationships, Chelsea struggles with her working relationship with pain-in-the-butt police sergeant and a co-worker who makes the sergeant look like an Alter-boy. Fortunately she has some well-meaning friends that when they aren't dishing out advice (sound or otherwise) provides welcomed support and much needed comic-relief. Chelsea soon discovers that forgiveness isn't so easy to come by, especially when it comes to forgiving yourself.
